A professional doctorate should be a different type of doctorate to the PhD; there is no point in having it exist as a weaker version of the PhD. The central feature of that difference is that professional doctorates should value other types of knowledge, namely knowledge of and in professional practice.

7. Professional practice life expectancy and value. A professional practice may have a shorter expected life span than other service businesses. This affects how you do income projections for the practice. And the income projections form the basis of such business valuation methods as Discounted Cash Flow. Importantly, the assumption of perpetual income stream may not be appropriate when valuing a professional practice. This reduces the practice's residual value.
